By the time the pharmacists dispense the drug and seek reimbursement, the administrators haven't adjusted their reimbursement rates and, therefore, insist on reimbursing pharmacies at the drug's older, lower price, pharmacists said. Mark Riley, who heads the Arkansas Pharmacists Association, said the administrators often pocket the difference without telling the employer or insurer whose plan they are administering — a practice known as creating a "spread." The Pharmaceutical Care Management Association said its administrators maintain lists of maximum allowable costs for generic drugs. Through the Arkansas law and others like it, the group said, pharmacists are trying to get reimbursed at the maximum allowable cost for each drug, "regardless of whether the pharmacies could have acquired the drugs for less, and regardless of whether the pharmacies receive rebates or discounts not reflected on the wholesaler's or manufacturer's invoice." "In essence," the group's lawsuit alleges, "Act 900 guarantees Arkansas pharmacies a profit on every MAC [maximum allowable cost] script filled." Riley said the situation is the exact opposite: "We're saying no, we're not greedy — you're greedy." He said a recent survey of members of the Arkansas Pharmacists Association, which represents about 2,200 pharmacists of all stripes — those working in small stores, regional chains and national chains, as well as those in hospitals or special compounding pharmacies — reflects that 11 percent of their prescriptions are reimbursed by pharmacy benefit managers at an amount below their net invoice costs, "and it's growing." "We can't continue to fill prescriptions below cost," Riley said
