Indeed the preamble of the YCJA outlines the Act's guiding principles, indicating that youths have "special guarantees of their rights and freedoms" and stipulating that the criminal justice system is to exercise restraint in the use of custody by reserving "its most serious intervention for the most serious crimes and reduc[ing] the over-reliance on incarceration for non-violent young persons." One limitation on the use of pre-sentence detention for youths is contained in section 29(1), which establishes that "[a] youth justice court judge or a justice shall not detain a young person in custody prior to being sentenced as a substitute for appropriate child protection, mental health or other social measures." Section 29(2) states that "[i]n considering whether the detention of a young person is necessary for the protection or safety of the public ..
