Risk factors associated with childhood obesity are a high intake of heavily processed, energy-dense foods and sugar-rich drinks, large portion sizes, a sedentary lifestyle and a lack of regular exercise. Being in lower-income groups may increase this risk further and, if children have overweight or obese parents, they are far more likely to become obese themselves. Latest research also shows that the prenatal environment and maternal nutrition during pregnancy have important roles to play. Finally, children’s exam and expectation-driven lifestyles without enough time for sleep and relaxation (just doing nothing) must share part of the blame.
